A million-dollar investment to speed up rates for consumers who pay their bills by direct debit is to be announced in the Budget. The move to go ahead with a national auto-debit system is another modest step in the Government's attempts to improve people's lives. Two years ago, the Progressive Democrats campaigned for four main economic reforms: the first was to ensure the system that holds us in debt was fair and transparent. Next, the PDs campaigned for small business tax breaks to create jobs and grow. The third component was a National Pension Scheme, and the last was to invest in enterprise so we could cut income and property taxes. With the Budget due on October 9, the Government will make another modest step by announcing a system that will allow Kiwis to pay their bills more simply. This works on the same principle that most credit cards work, by setting up a bank account for the consumer to make direct debit payments to. It will be voluntary and charge less than 0.05 per cent for the first three years, with a small fee of 0.03 per cent for subsequent years. It will operate in three-month blocks, similar to the current fortnightly system. The Government will announce the details of the process in late September. The Government has developed the National Debt Management Account or NDMA, with World Bank support and has provided an account manager to ensure that the new system is administered properly. The NDMA is a mechanism that means New Zealand will be able to allocate money to pay the national debt as quickly as possible. With a clear plan to transition into the debt management account in 2015, setting up the infrastructure, including the kiwi dollar, to allow this will benefit New Zealand's economic growth. The new system will mean that it will be much easier for the Government to raise money for public services by paying bills to the NDMA. The Government could negotiate lower debt interest rates if the Government paid all payments to the NDMA. This 1678ea9f9e
